

Within a fragmented landscape of technological adoption, different service modalities occupy varying proportions, where dominant interaction channels subtly outweigh infrastructural and advisory components. A significant segment is driven by user-facing platforms, while secondary layers distribute across service-oriented and backend systems, each contributing unevenly to the whole. Smaller fractions emerge from niche and experimental efforts, often overshadowed yet still integral, making the overall composition less immediately reducible to a clean proportional breakdown despite its underlying distribution.